Harry Skinner's Report: It was just before noon. I was in the café. I saw the truck coming. The truck driver was looking at the street numbers. I guess he was in a hurry to deliver something in his truck. The light was red, but the truck driver didn't stop. The truck hit the back of the school bus. I was really worried because of those kids. But no one was hurt. The kids in the bus were upset about the accident. They wanted to go home for lunch, but everyone needed to wait for a police officer to come and make a report. So the truck driver took them all into the café and paid for their lunch. It had a happy ending.

Jill Black's Report: The light was green for the truck. I know this because I was at the corner crossing the street. The bus driver just stopped right in the middle of the street. The truck driver didn't know that the bus was going to stop so suddenly. So he hit the back of the bus. Those bus drivers are crazy. I'm surprised no one was hurt, and I'm scared to put my little boy on the school bus.

There was and There were

Generally, we use there was and there were in the past tense. For singular objects we use there was and for plural objects we use there were.

We also use there was and there were depending on the subject.

Here are the some examples to understand where we use there was and there were.

1. There was no sugar in the jar (sugar is uncountable so it is treated as singular).
2. There was a book on the desk.
3. There was a rose plant in my garden.
4. There were millions of people watching cricket.
5. There were many buildings.
6. There were many persons in the meeting.
