Part 4: Inference*Text*The Cost of Carelessness

Gripped by panic, Alan's chest tightened as he realised his phone was nowhere to be found. His mind raced through last night's events, trying to locate the moment when he might have lost it. He couldn't help but think, If I had stayed at the hotel last night and allowed myself enough time to pack properly, I would not be in this situation.

Alan, a first-year university student, had woken up late and rushed to the airport to catch his flight back home. What he remembered of the evening before was going to dinner with his friend, John, and then meeting with a group of his classmates at a café for coffee afterwards. John scrolled through the apps enviously because it was the latest model, one that he desired but could not afford. Alan must have had his phone after seeing John because he used it to call a ride to the cafe. The last time he saw his phone was when he dropped it in the taxi, but Alan was fairly certain that he had picked it up. The taxi driver told him to be careful with his belongings, or else he might not ever see them again.

Alan now stood waiting for a taxi in front of the hotel worried about the implications of his carelessness. The fact was, he had saved all his money from his part-time job to get the very latest phone, with ample storage for all his work and personal information. Not only did it contain his banking information, but also his personal contacts and access to his social media accounts and photos.

With each passing minute, his anxiety surged, fueled by the fear of his privacy being violated. Alan thought about the young man in the blue jacket had been suspiciously close his bag as it sat on table at the retail shop where he and his classmates met for coffee. I doubt that the man would have taken it with so many witnesses, Alan thought. But then again, he reflected, people get ripped off in plain sight every day. Wishing that his day had started differently, Alan's imagination ran wild with worst-case scenarios that would probably come to his parents' minds, having not heard from him. He was sure that they were wondering why he hadn't answered their calls or text messages.

After having been home for a while, Alan wracked his brain wondering what happened to his phone. Did I put it in my pocket? Did I use it when I met my friends at the café? he wondered. He logged onto his laptop and discovered that he had been logged out of his social media accounts and none of his passwords worked. He checked his email and noticed receipts for several purchases in France, which was to be expected since he had been there for two weeks, but after looking at the dates and times of the purchases he became confused and worried.
