Part 4: Inference

Text

Bashayer's Dilemma

Never before had Bashayer felt such fear of disappointing her mother. Should she decide to invest in her organic skincare project along with Salma and Hind, her fellow students at university, there would be no one to manage the demanding fifty-year-old family business, Bash Fashion, a choice that would devastate her mum and the entire family, particularly after her initial agreement.

Bashayer pushed these thoughts from her mind as she left to meet Salma and Hind at GreenStart Expo: Innovating for a Sustainable Future. The exhibition was believed to provide them with new inspiration for their sustainable cosmetics business. They encountered a stall handled by Saeed Abdulrahman, a local entrepreneur known for his successful skincare line.

"I'm looking for someone young, driven, and ready to open a new organic spa," Saeed explained, addressing the three ladies. "There's something special about connecting people with ways they can get healthy," he added.

Sensing Bashayer's curiosity, Saeed handed her an expression-of-interest form and recommended that she consider the opportunity seriously. Bashayer's mind wandered, haunted by the thought of abandoning Bash Fashion. Not only would she ignite conflict with her family, but she'd also risk losing their support.

A few meters ahead, a presentation on fast fashion unexpectedly caught the ladies' attention. "Beyond ignoring the poor working conditions of employees, fast fashion generates 10% of the carbon dioxide and 92 billion kilos of the waste produced annually," the presenter declared. "By the time a new item is discarded, 73% of the material will have been burned or buried in landfill, and less than 1% of that collected for recycling will have been used to create new clothing," he added.

"Interesting!" Bashayer commented, looking concerned.

"It's not like we can change it," Salma responded.

"No matter what, I can't stop purchasing it. Fast fashion is trendy and cheap," Hind added.

"We all appreciate beautiful outfits, but I firmly believe there has to be a more eco-friendly and socially responsible way to produce clothes," Bashayer stated, her voice filled with determination and strength.

Bashayer paid close attention to the presenter as he highlighted the exceptional benefits of utilising bamboo in the clothing industry. He revealed that bamboo's rapid growth and bare requirements for water and pesticides had recently made it highly sought after by emerging environmentally conscious fashion brands. Unlike Salma and Hind, who couldn't wait to go back to Saeed Abdulrahman's booth, Bashayer absorbed every word and every figure about bamboo and other eco-friendly materials used to manufacture clothes. She wished she could share this moment with her mother.

Upon returning home, Bashayer approached her mother, strongly feeling that she had discovered a true calling. 'Mum, I have exciting news to share,' she confidently and joyfully announced.
