Part 3: Inference QuestionText*The Decision

The constant tornado of obligations left Jameila overcome with exhaustion and feeling that she was inadequately balancing work, school, and home life. She regularly spent the weekdays preparing 12th graders for university during the day, and after arriving home in the late afternoon, took care of her four-year-old son and cooked dinner for her husband. After all this, she still had to attend classes in the evening. At times, Jameila wanted to give up, but since it is a requirement to become a school administrator, she considered getting her master's degree to be a worthy investment, and now she was on the point of completing her coursework.

Although Jameila was not pleased to spend almost ten hours in class each week, she felt that learning in a classroom improved her focus as it provided a quiet place to learn. The guidance from her professors gave her the insight to navigate the most challenging concepts and tasks, and participating in class discussions and study groups, Jameila became friends with several of her classmates. Since Jameila went to a smaller, lesser-known establishment for her first degree, she decided to attend classes at a prestigious university for her master's.

In the past, Jameila's husband, Ali, had suggested that they hire a nanny, but she said, "Only if things get really busy, will we hire someone to help around the house." Ali decided to revisit the idea with Jameila when she arrived home from her classes that evening. Hopefully, he could convince her that it was a good idea now that their son, Ahmed, was going to kindergarten.

During a meeting with Jameila's advisor to select classes for the new semester, she revealed her worries about successfully completing her program without sacrificing the needs of her students and family; she had thought about taking a break from her studies. Jameila's academic advisor suggested that she add online courses to her schedule. When Jameila heard her mention them, a flood of anxiety swept over her. As her advisor explained which courses she could take online, Jameila imagined that it would be imperative that she worked independently to keep up with the assigned reading and research. Her classmates would only be acquaintances since their interactions would be limited to virtual components, and she would not get the same level of critique and advice from her professors. She had always avoided taking online courses because of their self-directed nature. Pushing away the pessimistic thoughts, Jameila considered that maybe she was focused on the negative stereotypes of online learning and not the reality.

A few weeks later, on a Wednesday evening, Ali packed Jameila's favourite foods for a picnic at the neighbourhood park while their nanny, Ana, kept a watchful eye on Ahmed as he played happily on the playground.
