Part 4: Inference

Text

Caught in the Storm

The day had started like any other weekend adventure. The sun was high, the sky was clear, and the rocky trails of the wadi stretched out ahead of us like an open invitation. My friends and I laughed as we hopped from boulder to boulder, taking pictures and enjoying the peaceful isolation. But by late afternoon, the wind began to shift. It carried a chill that hadn't been there before.

I looked up and saw dark clouds gathering, fast and heavy. A low rumble of thunder rolled through the canyon, followed by a sudden gust of wind that sent dust flying into our faces. Then, without warning, the sky cracked open. Rain poured down in thick sheets, and large hailstones began to slam into the rocks around us.

The dry wadi floor turned into a rushing torrent in a matter of minutes. We scrambled up a ledge, pressing ourselves against the canyon wall for cover. The roaring sound of water filled the air, louder than our voices as we shouted over it.

No one said it out loud, but the look in everyone's eyes said enough. There was no quick way out. The path we'd entered on was now underwater, and the icy hail had left bruises and panic in its wake.

We huddled in silence, watching nature's power crash through the wadi. In that moment, the desert didn't feel empty or peaceful—it felt alive, wild, and completely in control.

Part 4: Inference Question
