Reading Practice: A Memorable Weekend Adventure مغامرة نهاية أسبوع لا تُنسى

Last summer, my friends and I had an unforgettable لا ينسى experience that I would like to share. We decided to go on a spontaneous road trip to the countryside, excited to explore new places and create lasting memories together.

We started early on a sunny Saturday morning, driving through beautiful landscapes المناظر الطبيعية and charming villages. As we got closer to our destination, we couldn't help but be amazed by the natural beauty surrounding us.

The best part of our trip was visiting a lovely little town nestled in the hills. The cobblestone حصوه streets and colorful houses immediately caught our eye. We spent hours walking through the narrow paths, discovering cute cafes and shops that seemed like they were from a different time.

While exploring, we met a friendly local named Maria. She kindly offered to show us around and shared interesting stories about the town's history. Maria's warm personality and wealth of knowledge made our visit even more special. It felt like we had our own personal guide, making our connection to the place even stronger.

As the day went on, we stumbled upon a lively festival in the town square. The air was filled with the sounds of traditional تقليدي music, and locals were joyfully dancing. Unable to resist the festive atmosphere, we joined in and danced the afternoon away, creating memories that will stay with us forever.

Thinking back on this experience, I can't help but think about the diverse and interesting people we met on our journey. Each encounter added a unique flavor to our adventure, making it even more fulfilling.

Looking back, I would highly recommend such spontaneous تلقائي trips to anyone looking for new and exciting experiences. If you ever want a

Nick D'Aloisio got his first laptop when he was nine. He started designing apps when he was 12 and at 15 he launched an iPhone app called 'Summly'. It was an app which summarized stories in the news and it was downloaded by nearly a million people. His app has recently been bought by an Internet giant for $30 million.

"The proudest moment for me has been seeing these tweets coming through from teenagers saying, 'You've inspired me.' I'm so excited about that," says Nick. His mother says she was never worried about the amount of time he was spending on the computer, "because he would always show us what he was doing. I remember him creating 3D models on his computer as a 10-year-old."

Nick isn't arrogant and self-centered, which you might expect of a boy who has been described as a 'genius'. He is polite, likeable, enthusiastic and self-aware. He enjoys the humanities, cricket and rugby. "I want to do Philosophy at university and I'm studying Chinese and Russian at school," he says. He doesn't want to work in computer programming. He's more interested in product design.

What's he going to do with the money from his app? He might buy some clothes, he says, and maybe a new computer. One thing he'd like to do is to invest in small companies. "That's what is exciting, and if you are lucky to have a bit of money, you can take those risks. That's what I would do if I was going to go and spend it.

"What is Summly?" It helps publishers reach out to a younger audience," Nick says. He feels that young people are interested in the news, but they don't want to spend a lot of time reading long stories if they're not relevant to their lives. With Summly, you quickly find out whether a story might be interesting.
