Baby Brain

Love has a powerful influence on the brain. Researchers in America studied a group of children between birth and adolescence. During the children's early years, the researchers visited their homes twice – at the age of four and again when they were eight. They made notes on how many books the children had access to, if they were able to listen to music, and if they had toys which helped them learn numbers and letters of the alphabet. They also noted the level of warmth and affection shown to them by their parents or carers. When the children reached adolescence, the researchers looked at scans of their brains. They found that there was a direct link between IQ and the level of affection received at the age of four. By the time the children reached eight years old, the level of affection had no influence on IQ.

- 1 During the experiment, researchers visited the children two / four / eight times.
- 2 Researchers made notes on the temperature / attitude / numbers of the children's parents.
- 3 Brain scans were done on children / teenagers / adults.
- 4 The finding showed that young children with more books / love / toys had a better IQ.

Writing a blog can be a great thing to do. Indeed, you often hear stories of people turning their blog into their career and making a lot of money from it. But those are the minority cases, and the majority of bloggers do it for self-satisfaction and a relatively small following. But, before starting a blog, it's common sense to ensure you're doing it not only correctly, but also safely. Remember, your private details might be discovered, even if you don't use your real name. You might write about something one day and regret it later. Also, you mustn't write anything in a blog about someone which is untrue. This can land you in a lot of trouble. Finally, remember that anything written online stays online. So, have fun with your blog, but be careful and be safe
