Up-River and Down-River

- 1 Jim shook his head to get the water out of his eyes and smiled. He always feels so alive when he swims in the river. He loved the droplets of the cold water on his warm skin and the feel of his heart thumping in his chest. He was a fast swimmer; the fastest boy in his village.
- 2 As he was swimming one day, he had heard a sound in the bushes. He had looked up to see three boys who started throwing things at him. Jim had turned round and tried to swim home as fast as he could, but it was hard swimming against the river's current so the boys, who were walking along the bank, kept up with him easily.
- 3 Eventually, one of them threw a big stone which hit Jim on the back of the head. Jim felt the tears pricking the back of his eyes and warm blood on his neck. He swam faster letting the current taking him back home. As he approached his village, he saw his mother. He raised his arm to wave but heard her shouting: "Keep swimming! Rescue the little girl! Make her mum happy." She was pointing down-river at a spot in the distance.
- 4 Forgetting his tiredness, he increased his efforts and swam with the current as fast as he could. He could just make out the girl's head bobbing up once, then disappearing under the water. He swam faster still. The head bobbed up again, closer this time, and he heard a cry before the girl was dragged under the water. Jim was concentrating so hard on the girl that he didn't notice the boys in the bushes. He only knew they were there when a stone hit him on the back of the head. For a moment, there was so much pain that he couldn't see. Then he shook his head. "The girl!" Gathering the last of his energy, he took off again, reaching the little black head as the girl went down for the third time.
- 5 Jim carried the little girl towards the river bank. She was sobbing and clinging to him. To his surprise, the hands that reached down to help her out of the water belonged to the stone-throwing boys. When the little girl was safe, the hands stretched down to help Jim out, too. He hesitated.
"Don't worry," said a voice. "We didn't realize you were trying to rescue the little girl. Anyway, we only threw stones at you for fun. We throw stones at everything in the river." Jim took the offered hand. Once on the bank he sat down, his head drooping with exhaustion.
Suddenly there was a commotion as a truck drew up behind them. Out leapt the little girl's mother, closely followed by Jim's mother. She hugged him tight and kissed him on both cheeks. "You're a hero!" she said. "Do you want to swim back or do you want to come with us?"
"I'll come with you," said Jim. "I've done enough swimming for one day."
