A Changed Man

It is often said that people can't really change who they are. I disagree. Sometimes, what we need most is to change the way we live and the way we think, and I believe I am proof that this can happen. I was an aggressive businessman and I was quite successful. I worked long hours, but the money made up for that. I wouldn't say I had the perfect life. It was certainly busier and more stressful than I would have liked, and in my job you didn't make friends easily - but I couldn't think of anything really wrong with it.

It took a plane crash to realise I was wrong. One moment I was relaxing in business class, and the next we were thrown backwards as the plane started to dive towards the ground. We could hear the pilot's voice over all the noise, telling us all to stay calm, to stay in our seats while he tried to land the plane, but everyone was too busy panicking to listen.

When the plane eventually came down in the mountains, we were thankful to be alive. However, we were facing other problems. Up there, all communications were cut off. We couldn't call for help, and we had only what little food had been on board the plane. Everyone was scared, cold and hungry.

It might sound crazy, but it was not the difficulty of the conditions or the lack of food that I found the hardest to put up with. The feeling of being cut off from the rest of the world was what I couldn't stand. With no phone signal, there was no way for me to contact my clients or colleagues, and the thought of all the business I was missing out on made me feel sick. We were up there for four days before we were found. However, the days trapped in the mountains gave me time to think – something I hadn't done in a long time. I was shocked at my first reaction;

I realised I was worrying more about my work than about myself. I had always taken my phone for granted, and you might think that being away from work for so long would make me appreciate it more. In fact, it had the opposite effect. I realised that I needed to change. Or, rather, I had already been changed by my time in the mountains.

When I got back home, I gave most of my money to charity. I used the rest to travel around for a year. By the time I settled on this island, I no longer recognised the ambitious, greedy man I used to be. By chance, a friend from my old life in the city found me here. 'Don't you ever miss it?' he asked me. 'Aren't you miserable living on this island?'

When he told me stories of home, I did consider going back to it all - but only for a moment. Escaping that life has made me more observant of my surroundings and more sensitive towards others. My personality has changed, and I would no longer suit the life and job I used to have.

Could Online Video Gaming Be Good For Us?

As the popularity of online video games increases, we often hear questions concerning their value. Most parents will tell their child to spend less time in front of a screen, but research shows that spending some time playing online video games can be beneficial to a child's development.

Research has shown that skills players acquire from online video games can be used in their real lives. In the same way that pilots acquire basic flying skills from computer programs designed to imitate the conditions on a plane, children can also acquire real-world career skills from spending time online.

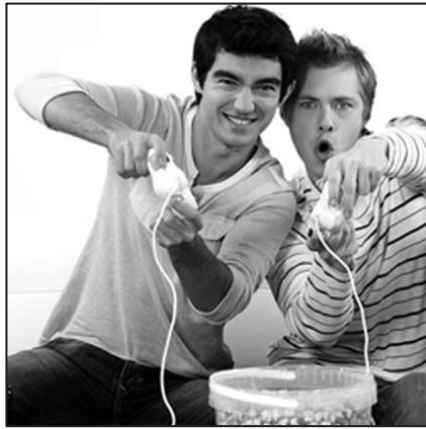

On a basic level, studies show that young children who regularly play video games have more advanced object control skills (catching or throwing a ball, etc.) than other children their age. Online games that require players to work as part of a team to complete a level teach teamwork and even leadership skills, which will be useful throughout life. Children also unconsciously practise time-planning and learning methods, and also improve their ability to memorise information. Some games, such as city-building or civilisation games, also train children in logical design, forward-thinking and even mathematics.

The most important factor of online video games is the social contact required – and it is this aspect that psychologists focus on when discussing online video games as a form of treatment for various social disorders.

The theory behind this is that playing a character in an online video game allows children to create a distance between themselves and their problems, letting them see things more clearly. This distance can also help them feel less nervous about talking to others. For children with social anxiety or communication difficulties, video games allow them to remain anonymous while they work on developing their social skills. Some computer games have even launched specific communities for such children, where the aim is to create an atmosphere of understanding and learning that will teach them how to function as part of a community.

Problems appear when, as with everything, too much time is put into playing video games. Apart from the headaches and eye problems that can be caused by spending too much time in front of a screen, children may become addicted. At this point, the online community begins to take priority over real life and, rather than encouraging real social contact, it may even prevent them from experiencing it. Also, instead of escaping into a virtual reality to clear their minds, children may sink too deeply into the fiction and ignore their problems altogether. If video games are only a part of a varied and balanced lifestyle, the risks of this happening are reduced, and children can benefit greatly from the lessons they provide.

1. Most parents understand the value of online video games.
2. The skills which children learn from video games can help in adult life.
3. Children who regularly play online video games achieve better marks than children who don't.
4. Online video games help children with communication difficulties feel secure.
5. According to the text, the disadvantages of online video gaming should be ignored.

Writing

Your class has done a survey to see how much of their time students usually spend each school day doing different activities. The results are shown in the pie chart. Interpret the information by selecting and reporting the main features, and make comparisons where relevant.
